Glen Cove: A View From the Past

Little remains today to remind us of what Glen Cove was like at the time of the Revolutionary War. There are, of course, some things that seem to have changed little if at all. The waves in Hempstead Harbor and Long Island Sound still roll onto the beaches, and the tides rise and fall the same now as then. The same stars adorn our night skies, changing with the seasons as they have through the ages. Several glacial boulders and other geologic features appear about the same as years ago, and a few large trees have survived the ravages of time and man.

A few buildings of that era stand today. Among them is the old Coles homestead at the northeast corner of The Place and Ellwood Street. The east wing of this building was built in 1668 by Robert Coles, one of the five original founders of Glen Cove. At the northwest corner of Duck Pond Road and Piping Rock Road is the Matinecock Friends Meeting House, constructed in 1725. These had all attained a respected age at the time of the Revolution and they are still in sound condition today. There are also several large farmhouses on Duck Pond Road and at other locations, many of which sheltered British or Hessian officers during the war.

Several of our roads were in use then, although they were much narrower and unpaved. In the summer, many of them were ankle-deep in dust. When it rained, the dust turned to mud, and the wheels of carriages and farm wagons wore deep ruts in the roads. The mud froze nearly as hard as concrete in the winter, making for very uncomfortable traveling.

One of the principal roads in Glen Cove at the time ran between the pier that extended into Hempstead Harbor at Sheep Pen Point (now Garvies Point) and the village. The pier and the creek were the focal point of marine activity during the early years of Glen Cove. The Landing did not achieve importance until the steamboats began running in 1829. Other roads in use then were The Place, where the first settlers had built their homes, Mill Hill, Glen Street, School Street, Dosoris Lane, and Cedar Swamp Road.

The area of the community was somewhat less than that of the present City of Glen Cove. Most of the land to the north, including West Island, East Island, and both sides of Lattingtown Road, was outside the boundary of the original village, although many who lived there traded at the shops on Glen Street and School Street and probably considered themselves residents of this village.

Even the name of this community was different then. It was called Musquito Cove, a name that was spelled differently from time to time. "Musquito" was derived from the Algonkian Indian language, meaning "the place of rushes." This apparently referred to the tall grass that flourished in the valley through which the creek flowed on its way to Hempstead Harbor.

Musquito Cove was a quiet, country village of approximately two hundred fifty inhabitants. It was part of the Town of Oyster Bay, in Queens County. About a century and a quarter later, the three easternmost towns of Queens County (the towns of Hempstead, North Hempstead, and Oyster Bay) became the County of Nassau.
