Those Memorable Days
By Angelo Capobianco

Although the Memorial Day celebration is set aside so that we may remember our Nation’s war dead, the events of this day, especially in the Glen Cove parade, have become traditional. The beaches were opened up officially on this holiday in past years. “Pop” Kinnear, one of our oldest lifeguards took the official first dip of the year down at Morgan’s Beach. Days in advance of the parade, the uniforms of all the services went to the dry cleaners for the annual cleaning. The local bands practiced well into the nights hoping to win the “The Best in the Parade” trophy. Firemen took out all the equipment from the Firehouse to polish it for the annual parade. Floats and displays were made for the Sea Scouts, Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts. I recall old BSA Troop 190’s Pioneer wagon pulled by one of Tony Genova’s horses. Who will ever forget the Elm Avenue Float of the Unknown Soldier just prior to WWII? Veterans’ organizations set up tables downtown and by the churches to sell the “red poppy.”

Nobody escaped these salesmen. On Memorial Day one was considered an anarchist if he did not wear a “poppy” for the disabled vets. Local cemeteries were decorated with the placing of the flags on the deceased vet graves. The large, old front porches along the parade route were spruced up for the event. I recall Dr. Conolly’s home (presently the site of McDonald’s) on Glen Street. A large flag was displayed on one side of it.

Glen Cove was a fiercely patriotic community and much of this emanated from our local schools. Eugene Gribbin, a WWI veteran and School Superintendent, instilled this “love of country” in the students. From day one in the public schools, gym classes were separated into two teams of competition – the “army team” and the “navy team,” and students remained on that team until the day they graduated. Upon graduation, many a student joined the service of his “gym team.”

The Physical Education Director prepared many a Glen Cover for the tough basic training he faced upon entering the service. Mr. Martin, Mr. Ghedde and Mr. Kirby of wood and metal shop also did their part for the war efforts. Model airplanes for the “spotter” were made by the hundreds in their shops. There were no guidance counselors around then and the advantages of a service career were pounded into everyone.

I recall the day after graduation, five of us in the graduation class hitchhiked to Front Street in Hempstead to sign up. Upon our return we were greeted by Mr. Gribbin with hearty good wishes. Glen Cove always assured its Nation’s calls in all wars. Rare was the deserter from this city. Glen Cove’s sacrificed their blood in every major campaign from Gettysburg to Quang Tri Province in Vietnam. In WWII we lost 45 men out of a population of 8,000.

The route of the parade prior to WWII was from the old high school, down School Street and up to Glen Street, to the Coles School and back to Harriet Pratt Park (presently the Firehouse). Watering holes along the route were Reilly’s Bar, O’Rourke’s “Dago” Franks, Hultz’ Glen Cove Tavern, The Clock Tavern, the American Legion Dugout on Pulaski Street and further up to Stroppel’s.

The black war vets made their return known in this parade. They formed their own Veteran American Legion Post and named it after their two heroes, Frank E. Simmons and Ralph Young (Ralph was killed in action over the Burma Mountains). The returning wounded and maimed took part in the parade, and today, as days gone by, the Glen Cove kids still ride their decorated bikes at the back of the parade.

Angelo Capobianco (Cappy) was born and raised in Glen Cove. This abridged version of the article he wrote in 1980 reflects his strong patriotism and dedication to our Glen Cove community. As Glen Cove Military Historian, Angelo honored Glen Cove war heroes for over 40 years by writing their biographies and submitting them to the local newspapers. Angelo retired from the Glen Cove Police Department in 1997. He also served as Nassau County Dean of Detectives, and at one time was the oldest detective in Nassau County.
