MAJOR MELANCTHON LLOYD WOOLSEY

Melancthon Lloyd Woolsey, a major in the New York State Levies, held the highest rank of all the men from Glen Cove who served the Patriot cause in the Revolutionary War. Melancthon Lloyd was the grandson of the Reverend Benjamin Woolsey, the noted clergyman who gave Dosoris its name (from the Latin “dos” and “uxoris,” meaning wife's dowry).

When Long Island fell into the hands of the British, Melancthon’s mother and his two sisters fled to the safety of Connecticut. Melancthon was given the command of Middle Fort, now Middlesburg, in Schoharie County, New York. These “forts” were little more than entrenchments and earthen-works constructed around a central building, which served as a shelter for the women and children.

In the fall of 1780, soon after Woolsey had taken over his new command, an immense force of British regulars, Loyalist militia, and Indians assembled to lay waste to the Mohawk and Schoharie valleys. This army was about 1000 men strong and was under the joint command of Sir John Johnston and the Mohawk Indian chieftain, Joseph Brant.

On the night of October 16, the army had stopped to make camp just a few miles north of Middle Fort. It was Sir Johnston’s strategy to attack Middle Fort at daybreak. Johnston’s plan was nearly successful. The largest portion of his army was able to pass beneath Upper Fort unobserved, but the rear guard had been discovered, and an alarm cannon fired to alert the garrison at Middle Fort of the impending attack. Their chance of a surprise attack thwarted, the British laid waste to the settlements surrounding Middle Fort. By eight in the morning, Sir Johnston’s forces began their assault on Middle Fort. Most of their shots and shells either fell short, or exploded too high to do any real damage. The Indians, who had hidden behind a clump of willows, directed a heavy musket fire towards the fort, but were too far away to hit anything.

There were only 150 regulars under the command of Major Woolsey, plus an additional 100 armed farmers from the local settlements. To make matters even worse, there were only a few pounds of powder left in the fort’s magazines. Woolsey’s first instinct, on seeing how badly his men were outnumbered, was to surrender the fort, but the militia officers, resolving to defend the fort to the last man, refused to let him raise a white flag. In fact, they threatened to shoot him if he tried.

About this time, Major Woolsey sought refuge in the stone house amidst the women and children. Driven out by their jeers, the courageous Major Woolsey spent the remainder of the engagement crawling around the entrenchments on his hands and knees. It is said that Woolsey’s faintheartedness was a source of great amusement to his men, and greatly raised their spirits.

After shelling the fort for several hours, without any visible results, the British decided to attempt to take the trenches by assault. They sent out a scout, under the guise of a white flag of truce, to assess the exact strength of the garrison at the fort. Timothy Murphy, the fort’s Indian scout, realized the true nature of the white flag and opened fire upon the British scout. The British attempted to get inside the fort several more times under the ruse of a white flag, but were repelled each time by Murphy and his comrades. The British then decided to withdraw. The Patriot losses were light: two dead, one wounded.

Precisely what Major Woolsey did after suffering such humiliation in the eyes of his men is unclear. He settled on the shores of Lake Champlain, never returning to his ancestral home at Dosoris.

This article is an abridged version of an essay written by the late Robert R. Coles and the late Daniel E. Russell.
