William J. Johnson & The Tuskegee Airmen

The Tuskegee Airmen were the first African-American aviators in US Army Air Corps history. The number of living Tuskegee Airmen is rapidly dwindling, and are remembered as legendary heroes who fought against the Nazis during WWII and against racial discrimination at home and in the military.

William J. Johnson, a lifelong Glen Cove resident, proudly served our country as a Tuskegee Airman during WW II. Mr. Johnson was interviewed in the Robert R. Coles History Room in 2013. The following excerpts from Mr. Johnson’s oral history capture some of his memories of Glen Cove and his military service.

“My family moved up from North Carolina in 1929. They decided to move to Glen Cove because several people who lived in their community had come here and they wanted to leave the South. I guess that was the beginning of the great migration of Blacks. I was four years old. I did all my schooling in Glen Cove and graduated from the “new” high school in 1943.”

“I have wonderful memories of Glen Cove. I think during the Depression, things were rough, especially for minorities. What held us together, what made us happy was love – our parents. It was a simple life. We did simple things – it was love – family, and it stayed with us all our lives.”

“The school system here – the teachers were very fair to everybody. I never felt any prejudice in our school system, except one thing. I did notice that there were no Black employees – no Black teachers, no Black janitors . . .”

“I spent a lot of time in the library when I was a youngster, up on Forest Avenue, up on Glen Street, Continental Place and here. I think I read every fairy tale book they had in the library – the Tooth Fairy, the Red Fairy, Arabian Nights and what not. I think about the good old days – the memories – the people, and how pleasant the memories are. The Boys Club… how we played there, the people we grew up with. I’ve been blessed. I think that my blessing comes from living in this community because the people here - here in Glen Cove were very good. We were a large family - ten of us. The residents and merchants of Glen Cove were very, very good to my family.”

“I remember during the spring, my father had us digging up the ground and planting and I noticed the planes flying over from Mitchell Field. When I heard about the Tuskegee Airmen, the so called experiment, I think in 1941, I decided that was what I wanted to do, and I prepared for it, so when they gave a course in aeronautics at the Glen Cove High School, I took it.”

“I entered the service in January, 1944. I was an honor student and most of the fellows that I flew with were very bright. Once I did all the tests - physical, mental, psychological and everything else, I got my orders to go to Tuskegee Army Airbase for pilot training.”

“I remember when I was there, the only place I really felt safe, was on the Air Base – Tuskegee Army Airfield, or Tuskegee Institute. On a weekend pass I went to Atlanta two times. I had to ride on the back of the bus. They pulled a curtain over in front of us, and I had to listen to racial insults all the way from Tuskegee to Atlanta. When we got to Atlanta, I had to look around at the signs for Whites or Blacks, to go to the men’s room or where you could buy something, etc. It was a very, very touchy situation and I didn’t want to be in the South any longer than I had to be.”

“When we came home, racism was worse in Glen Cove than when I left. There were areas in Glen Cove where you couldn’t buy a house if you were Black - all the new developments – I guess they took the cue from Levittown.”

“I’ll never forget what this sergeant down at Keesler Field in Biloxi, Mississippi said, ‘You fellows are our very best. When you go back, do something; get involved to help our people.’ So when I came back, I knew I had to get involved in one way or another. I joined the NAACP. We had to fight to fight (to serve in the military). It was so ridiculous. We fought for equality and justice and I think our battle made it better for everybody, especially when you look at one of the major groups that profited from our fight for equality in this country – women, who were also oppressed in this country. When we fought, everybody was forced to take a look at equality and justice – to give it a hard look and see if inequality and injustice existed and it had to be eliminated. Our battle was not only for Blacks. It was for everybody.”

Four years after Johnson’s induction, President Harry S. Truman signed an executive order that barred segregation in all branches of the armed services. Executive Order 9981, issued on July 26, 1948, would eventually transform the military.
