During the years spanning World War II, Glen Cove became known as the “town with the big dog”. And it was a big dog – nearly 250 pounds. “Butch” as he was named, was born in 1939 in the Great Neck-Douglaston area. This young St. Bernard dog was a natural baby-sitter, faithfully keeping watch over his owner’s young children. But during WWII with meat rationing in effect, Butch’s original family found it difficult to keep a growing St. Bernard well-fed. Also, as Butch grew in size it was felt he needed more room to run, so his owner reached out to the J. Norris Miller family of Glen Cove. Having more resources at their command and a moderate-sized estate that fronted along Forest Avenue (where shopping centers exist today) the Millers agreed to take in Butch, under the care of young Ann Miller. In the early 1940s, Butch became a resident of Glen Cove and soon rose to national prominence.

Although Butch’s new owners had a large property to explore, Butch preferred downtown Glen Cove. Mornings, he enjoyed roaming down Forest Avenue past the schools where he became a favorite of the students he met along the way. During the day, he could usually be found in the village visiting his favorite shops and taverns for snacks, such as O’Rourke’s Diner, the Big Ben Market, and the Bridge Street Lunch Wagon to name a few, and at other times of the day he might be napping in the lobby of the Cove Theater, at the Glen Street Railroad Station, or simply lounging on the sidewalk, where pedestrians would nimbly step around him. He was known to travel to The Landing, and to hang out near the Morgan Beach refreshment stand, likely waiting for a child’s ice cream to slip off of its cone. In short, Butch might be found anywhere in the city. Glen Cove’s Mayor Aitkenhead declared that Butch had a “Get out of jail free” card that made him immune from being picked up by the city’s dog catcher.

Butch’s wanderings were prompted by his love of people (especially children) and the free handouts that Glen Cove’s business owners were happy to provide. But this pooch had broad culinary preferences and he traveled to satisfy them, most famously, hopping aboard the LIRR train at Glen Street and riding it to Oyster Bay to visit Hanophy’s Market on South Street. Practically every railroad conductor knew the four-footed vagabond, as did many of the commuters of the day.

Butch’s fame spread overseas during World War II when GIs from Glen Cove told their buddies about the big dog back home. In a time of conflict, sacrifice, and privation, Butch became a symbol of normalcy and the small town life that existed before the War. Butch’s owner, Ann Miller, recounted stories of servicemen who would write to her to inquire about him, and to say that Butch reminded them of home. After the War ended, Butch’s story was featured in a Life Magazine article in 1946, entitled “The Town Bum” and so, Butch began his career as a national celebrity. Shortly after the Life Magazine photospread appeared, a team from Universal Studios arrived in Glen Cove to film a short feature film about Butch and his adventures.

With much fanfare in the local papers, the premier of Butch’s film, “Hobo Hound”, took place at the Cove Theater in September 1946. Butch was given a makeover befitting a celebrity and he arrived at the opening in a 1947 Frazer automobile loaned for the occasion by the local dealership. The reluctant star was coaxed to make a brief appearance on stage prior to the screening of the 8-minute flick with a pocketful of chop meat. “Hobo Hound” was shown far and wide throughout the United States and in about 80 countries abroad.

When Butch passed away in May of 1948, news of his death spread like wildfire throughout the community. Upon hearing of Butch’s passing, the Glen Cove City Council took official notice of it at its regular Tuesday meeting, with Mayor Luke Mercadante offering a eulogy, and a request to the local Chamber of Commerce to consider memorializing Butch. Funds were collected in Butch’s name by the Glen Cove Lions Club and used for a program to train “seeing eye” dogs for the blind, and to cast a 20-pound bronze plaque that was dedicated at the Glen Street Station.

Postscript: Unsuccessful attempts to keep his legend alive continued for a few years with a known son of Butch named Teddy, and more famously, “Butch II”, a young St. Bernard discovered by Newsday publisher Alicia Patterson. Ms. Patterson had Butch II trained to duplicate his rail excursions, and with a passenger car filled with dignitaries and the press, the Butch replacement was off to Oyster Bay. However, after biting several people aboard the train, the experiment abruptly ended.

The History Room is open to the public every Monday, from 2pm to 5pm and Thursday, 9am to 12 noon, or call Carol Stern @ 516-676-2130 for an appointment.
